

Fiber Optic Cable Red Cable

AI Overview

Red fiber optic cables are typically used to identify specific fiber types or applications, often OM1 multimode, and are available in various lengths and connector types for high-speed data transmission. Color Coding and Purpose Red fiber optic cables are part of a standardized color-coding system defined by TIA-598-D, which helps technicians quickly identify fiber types and manage complex installations. In many cases, red jackets indicate OM1 multimode fiber, which is commonly used for short-distance data transmission in networks, patch panels, and data centers. Color coding reduces errors during installation and maintenance, especially when dealing with multi-fiber cables containing dozens of strands. Cable Types and Specifications Red fiber optic cables are available in multimode configurations, such as 62.5/125 μm OM1 duplex cables, which support high-speed, low-loss data transmission. Common connector types include LC, ST, and SC, with LC connectors typically having a 1.25 mm ferrule and ST connectors a 2.5 mm ferrule. The cables often feature a PVC jacket with a 2.0 mm outer diameter for durability and flexibility. Bend radius and other mechanical specifications vary by manufacturer, so checking product datasheets is recommended. Applications Red fiber optic cables are widely used in: Data centers and server rooms for patching and interconnects Telecommunications networks for short-distance multimode connections Industrial and commercial installations where color-coded identification is critical for maintenance and troubleshooting Purchasing Options Red fiber optic cables can be purchased from major retailers and specialized suppliers: Amazon offers a variety of red fiber optic cables in different lengths and connector types Best Buy provides online and in-store options for red fiber optic cables FiberCablesDirect and Eaton/Tripp Lite supply high-quality OM1 multimode duplex cables with LC and ST connectors, often with lifetime warranties Choosing the right red fiber optic cable depends on the required fiber ty...
